

Two-Bits, the World War II Lookout Dog

A persistent fox terrier named Two-Bits earned a brief measure of national fame while spending the winter of 1942-1943 at the Siskiyou Mountains' isolated Whisky Peak Lookout. Called a "war hero" by the press, Two-Bits became the subject of front-page newspaper articles across the country, and his story was told in a children's book about famous animals.

During the early years of World War II, the Army Air Corps took over a number of U.S. Forest Service fire-lookout facilities on the Pacific Coast as part of its Aircraft Warning Service (AWS), an emergency program to have observers scan the western skies for enemy aircraft until the new technology of radar could be perfected and installed at strategic places. Among those lookouts was the Rogue River National Forest's 6,497-foot-high Whisky Peak.

A 14-by-14-foot lookout building perched on the summit next to a near-vertical 600-foot drop to Low Gap Creek, the lookout became winter quarters for Two-Bits's owner, Bill Zeigler, and another AWS man. Their task at Whisky Peak, which was in a rugged and remote portion of southeastern Josephine County, was to report to the army by means of crank telephone any aircraft heard or observed. Forest Service crews on skis delivered food and other supplies to the pair every two weeks. Two-Bits spent his days at Whisky Peak chasing the chipmunks that begged for food.

By February, the abundant snow on the summit had formed an icy cornice that overhung the precipice. One day, Two-Bits charged the rodents with too much vigor, sliding across the ice and over the cliff. Zeigler assumed that his dog could not have survived the plunge and so was surprised to see Two-Bits back at the lookout about a week later. Apparently having landed in a deep snowbank, Two-Bits had managed to crawl and limp his way up to the summit. Two-Bits took the same plunge a few weeks later. Zeigler assumed the worst, but again the dog appeared at the top of Whisky Peak.

When Zeigler and Two-Bits returned to Jacksonville in the summer of 1943, word of the dog's exploits came to the attention of local reporters. Having survived both falls "without physical impairment or loss of morale," the Medford Mail Tribune made Two-Bits a canine symbol of Home Front stolidity and determination. Two-Bits died a few years after the war.
