

George Flavel (1823[?]-1893)

As a young man, George Flavel made his way in 1849 to Astoria after a stint as captain of the brig John Petty. He sailed around Cape Horn and spent time in California during the Gold Rush years. As a result of his work as a sea captain and businessman, he was one of the richest men in Oregon. He is remembered for his generosity but also for his efforts to make the City of Astoria an important shipping, salmon canning, trading, timber, and real estate center on the West Coast.

Flavel was born in 1823 or 1824 in Norfolk, Virginia. After earning his pilot's license, he was able to guide ships from the Pacific up the Columbia to the Willamette River. Having the license permitted Flavel and his partners to establish a virtual monopoly on bar piloting and ship touring on the Columbia.

In December 1852, during a particularly strong gale, the General Warren lost its fore-topmast and sprang a leak, and its engine proved futile against the heavy seas near Astoria. Flavel was unable to rescue the Warren, and forty-two people aboard the ship perished. Nevertheless, his efforts to save the Warren made him a hero to the people of Astoria.

Flavel married Mary Christina Boelling in 1854 when he was thirty and she was fourteen. They had three children—Nellie, Katie, and George C. During their married life, as his business prospered, the Flavels divided their time between San Francisco and Astoria.

In 1869, Flavel and his partners built a steam tug, Astoria, and used it as a pilot boat. A subsidy from the State of Oregon allowed him to continue to dominate the piloting business.

Some people were jealous of Flavel's success as a ship pilot and businessman. In 1875, William Reid—a lawyer, financier, and secretary of the Portland Board of Trade—began challenging Flavel's dominance of the piloting business on the Columbia River. He alleged that Flavel charged monopoly rates for towing and piloting vessels across the bar. Flavel saw he needed to protect his reputation from being sullied by Reid, and he began a vigorous effort in the Astoria newspaper to refute Reid's claims. He was also successful in getting a bill killed in the Oregon legislature before it could harm his bar-piloting business.

In 1886, Flavel's income from his business interests permitted him to build an elaborate 11,600-square-foot mansion at the corner of Eighth and Duane Streets in Astoria, which cost a reported $36,000. The Flavels presided over Astoria society for thirty years.

Flavel died at his Astoria home on July 3, 1893, after a long illness. His funeral procession was one of the largest ever in Astoria.

Written by William Stack

Further Reading:

Dennon, J. "Captain George Flavel." Cumtux Clatsop County Historical Society Quarterly 11.3 (Summer 1991): 20-30.

Trillin, Calvin. "The Magnificent Flavels." In America's Eccentric & Extrordinary, edited by K. Kirtley, 12-13. Salem: East Oregonian Publishing Company, 2010.

Willingham, William F. "Captain John Flavel and the Building of Astoria." In Prominent Astorians, edited by K. Kirtley, 134-143. Salem: East Oregonian Publishing Company, 2010.