

Oregon State Library

Since 1905, the Oregon State Library in Salem has worked to develop library services for all Oregonians. The library also serves as the library for state government, maintaining a comprehensive collection of state publications dating to the nineteenth century.

As part of the executive branch of state government, the State Library is governed by a seven-person board of trustees, appointed by the governor. The state librarian serves as the chief executive and secretary to the board.

The State Library works with local public libraries, academic libraries, school libraries, and special libraries in nearly every Oregon community, providing grants and other forms of assistance to improve library services and to foster cooperation and sharing of library resources. In addition, the State Library operates the Talking Book and Braille Services program, which serves as a public library to approximately five thousand blind and print-disabled Oregonians. This service sends recorded books, Braille books, captioned videos, and specialized players free of charge to eligible borrowers.

The State Library was established by the legislature in 1905 as the Oregon Library Commission. The bill that created the library was drafted by Mary Frances Isom, the first director of the Multnomah County Library, and was modeled on the statute that created the Wisconsin Free Library Commission. Isom served as a member of the first commission and recruited the first state librarian, Cornelia Marvin Pierce, to come to Oregon from the Wisconsin Free Library Commission. In 1913, the name of the Oregon Library Commission was changed to the Oregon State Library.

The State Library shared quarters with the Oregon Supreme Court until 1939, when the present State Library Building was constructed as the first building on what is today the Capitol Mall. The historic State Library Building, which shares many similarities with the State Capitol completed just a year earlier, was extensively renovated in the 1990s.

Today, the State Library provides advanced information services to state agencies from the State Employee Information Center website. Since 2006, the library has collected state publications not only in printed form but in digital form as well. An innovative law passed by the legislature now requires agencies to deposit a digital copy of all publications so that they can be preserved in the new Oregon Documents Repository.

Another innovation of the Oregon State Library is the Ready-to-Read Grant program for public libraries, which grants funds annually to all public libraries to help support their early literacy and summer reading services.

The Oregon State Library celebrated its centennial in 2005.

Written by Jim Scheppke

Further Reading:

Jim Scheppke. "Origins of the Oregon State Library." Oregon Historical Quarterly 107:1 (Spring 2006): 130-40.

Oregon State Library, <http://oregon.gov/OSL/index.shtml>.

Copyright © 2008-2013 Portland State University