

Thomas Lamb Eliot (1841-1936)

Thomas Lamb Eliot was one of the most influential clergymen in the history of Oregon. He is an excellent example of the Social Gospel movement in the Pacific Northwest; as a result, he wielded significant influence on Portland civic and social life. Eliot is a good reminder that although the Northwest has long been the least churched region of the country, it was not without its notable religious figures.

Eliot was born on October 13, 1841, in St. Louis, Missouri. As the eldest son of the Rev. William G. Eliot, he grew up in an environment that prized learning and civic involvement. In 1862, he was in the first class to graduate from Washington University in St. Louis. During the Civil War, he served in the Union Home Guard of Missouri, but saw no action. Eliot subsequently attended Harvard Divinity School and graduated in 1865. That same year, he married Henrietta Robins Mack of St. Louis.

In Portland, then a city of approximately 6,000 people, a group of prominent Portland citizens—including Thomas Frazar, Charles Burrage, James Cook, and Robert Thompson—were raising funds to establish a Unitarian church. A chapel was dedicated in 1867, the same year Eliot was invited to be the church's minister.

Eliot approached his new calling with enthusiasm. By nature an optimist, he possessed a faith in progress that was typical of his generation. He quickly increased church attendance and was often found preaching at local jails and working with mentally ill patients at the local hospital. Between 1872 and 1875, he served as the Multnomah County superintendent of education and was known for his tireless efforts to improve both teachers and schools.

Even though he had been troubled since the age of fifteen with impaired vision—he could not read or write without pain for more than a quarter hour at a time—Eliot was indefatigable. He served as the minister of the First Unitarian Church until he resigned in 1893.

Eliot loved his work in Portland and was known for his gracious spirit and good will. He fell in love with the Northwest and became an avid mountaineer. He represented a generation of Victorian gentlemen who believed that their duty was to transplant Western culture and civilization into the Pacific Northwest. An expert on the conditions facing Native Americans on reservations in Oregon, he worked to improve conditions there.

Most notably, Eliot advocated for causes and projects that would improve life for women and children. He helped found the Ladies Relief Society and fought for the prohibition of alcohol, because it seemed tied to domestic violence. He worked with Abigail Scott Duniway for woman's suffrage in part as a strategy for securing prohibition.

One historian referred to Eliot as the “conscience of the community.” Eliot believed that a society should take care of its abandoned children and those adolescents who found their way into the criminal justice system. He helped establish a local orphanage, the Children's Home, and served as its president from 1875 to 1919. He became an expert on juvenile delinquency and helped organize the Boys and Girls Aid Society, which functioned as a reform school intended to help abused children and juvenile delinquents re-enter society. He was a trustee at the society from 1885 to 1921. He also helped found the State Board of Charities and Correction.

Eliot believed fully in the value of the liberal arts and served as the director of the Art Association and director of the Library Association. He developed a passion for Reed College and served as chair and member of its board of trustees for over two decades. He received honorary degrees from Harvard, Washington University, and Reed College.

Thomas and Henrietta Eliot had eight children. Their oldest son, William G. Eliot Jr., became the pastor of Portland's First Unitarian Church in 1906. When Thomas Lamb Eliot died in Portland on April 28, 1936, Portland residents had many reasons to celebrate the life of a man who had worked so diligently on behalf of his community.

Written by Dale E. Soden

Further Reading:

MacColl, E. Kimbark. The Shaping of a City: Business and Politics in Portland, Oregon 1885-1915. Portland, Oreg.: The Georgian Press, 1976.

Scheck, John F. "Thomas Lamb Eliot and His Vision of an Enlightened Community." In The Western Shore: Oregon Country Essays Honoring the American Revolution. Portland: Oregon Historical Society, 235-269.

Copyright © 2008-2014 Portland State University